As fine a little political contest as the old town of Killingly has had on its hands in many a day is now in full swing, chief interest centering on full swing, chief interest centering on the election of repesentatives. Of the six men in the field for the two offices—candidates of the republican, democratic and progressive parties—no words but good words are spoken. It is this fact and the high standing of the men that makes the outcome of the contest so difficult to forecast. There is, of course, an occasional individual who has a grievance against some one of the sextette but the fact some one of the sextette, but the fact stands out that they are all strong candidates and vote-getters. It will be a mighty difficult, almost impos-sible, feat, for party leaders to keep the rank and file from splitting tickets that votes may be east for friends of that votes may be cast for friends of opposite political faiths, but this is what they are striving to do—each with his own party. The other fellows' splitting to help is, of course, another proposition.

day that the Maheu restaurant in Pomfret street had been broken into Pomfret street had been broken into during the night and a coin-operating gas meter stolen. This piece of work, as it was done, had possibilities of fatal results for persons sleeping in the building, for when the meter was taken away a stream of gas was left flowing from a three-quarter inch pipe. The noise made by the crook—there is good reason for assuming there was only one—awakened the sleepers, however, and the strong smell of gas led to an investigation that determined the cause cause of the leak.

A wrench missing from a gardee that was broken into was probably used in taking off the meter, which the thief carried away with him that he might have opportunity to remove at his leisure the quarters that were in it.

The young man who did the work is most certainly familiar with the premises. He was also aware that there was money in the meter, but probably did not know that it contained according to the police something less than $2. He gained entrance to the restaurant through a window at the rear and had ample time to work without being detected. The meter is the property of the Putnam Light and Power company.
